SYNOPSIS:

Six months before his 60th birthday several years ago, Mr. Wan M Y contemplated various ways for celebration. At last, he chose to share a part of his life experience with young people and decided on the subject of lifelong learning rather than surveying, and spent two hours on the eve of the birthday talking to over 100 young people about some 30 books. He called it “Learning to Learn”. He wishes that such sharing will become a tradition for the hard working Chinese when one turns 60. The talk has since been repeated several time adding good books recently read, and those forgotten but coming back to memory.

He likes reading, and has read many good books amidst a lot of rubbish. Introducing to the young generation some good readings will help them navigate an interesting life itinerary and mitigate the waste of time, hence life. It is impossible to reread every book so he will talk from memory. He wishes to contemplate with the audience what we are, where we are, how to survive, making a living and the lives of some exemplary people with their biographies/autobiographies in an overall attempt to picture a way to live a good life.

This is another repetition of the birthday talk.
